

statement of Indian spy Kulbhushan Jadhav, who had been captured by Pakistani law enforcement agencies in March. “Jadhav’s public confession makes a clear reference to that country in South Asia,” Mr Zakaria noted. “We have strong evidence and confessions to validate our claim.” PM Modi while speaking on terror financing during the last session of the G20 Summit had said: “There are some nations that use terrorism as an instrument of state policy. ...Indeed one single nation in South Asia is spreading these agents of terror in countries of our region.” The Indian leader had then called for isolating and sanctioning that South Asian country. He had made a similar pitch at an informal meeting of BRICS leaders on the sidelines of G20 Summit. Intensified bickering and frequent exchange of barbs between India and Pakistan has coincided with aggravation in bilateral ties in the aftermath of eruption of protests in held Kashmir over the killing of a young militant commander, Burhan Wani, at the hands of Indian forces there. From the Indian side, Mr Modi has been leading the charge against Pakistan, whereas the response from Islamabad has been largely at the official level. The epicenter of state terrorism are democratic nations like America and India that spearhead the support of movements like the Baloch separatists and Afghan Taliban. These movements are opposed to the territorial integrity of Pakistan, but the Pakistani foreign office is unable to articulate a coherent argument exposing such plots.

North Korea Accused of Maniacal Recklessness after Nuclear Test Triggers Earthquake

North Korea has confirmed it has conducted its most powerful nuclear test to date, marking the 68th anniversary of its founding with a reminder to the world that it may be edging closer to developing a warhead capable of striking the US mainland. Friday morning’s test, which triggered a magnitude 5.3 earthquake, drew immediate condemnation from North Korea’s neighbours and Washington. Barack Obama, who was briefed on board Air Force One by National Security Adviser Susan Rice as he returned to the US from an Asian tour, said provocative actions by North Korea would have “serious consequences”. Japan called for an emergency meeting of the UN security council and its prime minister, Shinzo Abe, described North Korea’s nuclear weapons programme as a “grave threat” to Japan. Japan’s top government spokesman, Yoshihide Suga, labelled North Korea a “neighbourhood outlaw” and said Tokyo was considering a new round of bilateral sanctions. China, North Korea’s traditional ally and major aid provider, voiced its “firm opposition” to the test. “We strongly urge [North Korea] to honour its commitment to denuclearisation, comply with relevant UN security council resolutions, and take action to stop the situation from deteriorating,” the foreign ministry said. The South Korean president, Park Geun-hye, denounced the test as a clear violation of security council resolutions banning the North from developing nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction. Park accused Kim of “maniacal recklessness” in his pursuit of building a viable nuclear arsenal, according to her office. Friday’s test was confirmed by North Korea with state TV saying it had conducted a “nuclear warhead explosion” meant to counter what Pyongyang called US hostility. The KCNA official news agency said: “This [test] has definitely put on a higher level ... DPRK’S technology of mounting nuclear warheads on ballistic rockets. [Source: The Guardian]

Surely, the only country worthy of the label “maniacal recklessness” is the US that has used nuclear weapons against Japan. North Korea fears America’s hegemony in the Asian Pacific and it is only natural for Pyongyang to acquire nukes to deter American aggression. Likewise, the Arab states should acquire nukes to offset the nuclear warheads of the Jewish entity. But the West’s nuclear apartheid policy ensures that any country seeking to oppose Western hegemony is denied nuclear arms.
